

GroupM and DISH Media Sales Announce Groundbreaking Addressable Advertising Success

Partnership delivers first-ever household-addressable television ad campaigns to a national footprint

Global media investment management firm GroupM, part of WPP (NASDAQ: WPPGY), and DISH Media Sales, a division of DISH Network Corporation (NASDAQ: DISH), announced that jointly they have been successfully delivering household-addressable advertising nationally to more than seven million DISH DVR subscribers since last October in a first for the industry.

"These trial campaigns with DISH demonstrate our ability to identify a specific target audience and deliver to them a relevant message, thus reducing unwanted impressions," said Michael Bologna, GroupM managing partner and director of emerging communications. "Household-addressable advertising in a television universe, long considered a 'holy grail,' is finally starting to become a practical reality."

"We have successfully executed campaigns for 10 of GroupM's advertising clients representing a variety of categories including multi-brand consumer packaged goods and financial services," said Warren Schlichting, senior vice president of DISH Media Sales. "We're ready to grow that relationship with a successful product and proven results."

DISH relies on third-party technology to target advertisements to specific households by using anonymized secondary demographic data. These data are integrated with additional targeting information provided by the advertiser. In no instance is the DISH subscriber's personally identifiable information disclosed to advertisers.

"This is a game-changer for DISH, advertisers and marketers," said Schlichting. "The GroupM campaigns have proven that our addressable product affords more control and efficiency to advertisers. We see an improved viewer experience with the delivery of more relevant ads, and marketers benefit by putting their product in front of a more receptive audience."
